D.

D, d, n. indecl. or (on account of litera) f. The fourth letter of the Latin alphabet. I. Corresponding in sound and place to the Greek Δ, but called simply De: Ter. Maur. p. 2385 P.; Auson. de Litt. Monos. 14 in Idyll. 12; having a harder pronunciation when closing a syllable or preceded by other consonants: whence the frequent and, in part, very old orthography at (præpos.), haut, set, aput, aliut, etc., atpellavit, atfines, itcirco, etc., Alexanter, Cassantra, etc., for ad, haud, sed, etc. Cf. Quint. 1, 4, 16; Vel. Long. p. 2230 P.; id. ap. Cassiod. p. 2287 ib.; Victorin. p. 2454 fin. ib.; on the other hand, the use of d for t, which sometimes appears in MSS. and Inscrr., as ed, capud, essed, inquid (all of them in the Cod. palimps. of C. Rep.), is to be ascribed to a later phonetic softening.

II. As an initial, the letter d, in pure Latin words, suffers only one vowel after it: the single consonantal compound dr is found only in borrowed words, such as drama, Drusus, Druides, etc., and in the two onomatopœes, drenso and drindio. Accordingly, the d of the initial dv, from du, was rejected, and the remaining v either retained unaltered (so only viginti for duginti; cf. triginta) or changed into b (so in bellum, bis, bonus, for duellum, duis, duonus; v. those words and the letter B, p. 201, col. 2). So, too, dj (from di before vowels) lost its d, as in Jovis for Diovis, and Janus for Dianus; and hence, as di also interchanged with the Greek ζ (as in ζα for δια, and zeta for dueta), we sta. find the same name written in two or three ways, as Diabolenus, Jabalenus, Zabalenus; Jadera, Diadora, Zara; v. Buttmann's Lexil. I. p. 220.—As a medial, d, before most consonants, undergoes assimilation; v. ad, no. II.; assum, init., and cf. iccireo, quippiam, quicquam, for idcirco, quidpiam, quidquam; and in contractions like cette from cedite, pelluciæ from pediluviæ, sella from sedela; in this last case, a compensation is less frequently effected by lengthening the preceding vowel, as scāla for scandela. D before s was suppressed altogether in grammatical inflection, as pes from ped-s, apsis from lapid-s, frons from frond-s, ruit from rad-si, risi from ride-si, lusi from lud-si, clausi from claud-si (only the verb cedo assimilated d in cessi); and in composition, when another consonant followed after the s, as ascendo, aspicio, asto, astringo; whereas they wrote acclamo, accresco; affligo, affrico; asplomero, aggrego; applico, approbo, etc. Also, in agnatus, agnatus, and agnasco the d yielded to the nasal pronunciation of the gn; and in tentum to the concurrence of the n and t, because a combination ntt would be contrary to the laws of euphony, according to which no consonant can be doubled after another.—As a final, d stood only in ad, and in the instances cited below in no. IV. Otherwise, the ending d was considered barbarous, Prisc. p. 686 P.

III. The letter d is interchanged: A. With t: mendax from mentior, quadraginta, quadra, etc., from quatuor.—B. With r: ar and ad; apor and apud; meridies and medidies; audio and auris.—C. With l: dacrima and lacrima, dingua and lingua; and, on the contrary, olere for odere; Ulixes from Ὀδυσσεύς. D. With s: Claudius, from the Sabine Clausus, medius and μέσος; and, on the contrary, rosa and ῥόδον. Cf. Schneid. Gr. 1. pp. 255—259.

IV. As a grammatical afformative, d was used: A. In the oldest period of the language, to designate the Ablat. sing. and the adverbs proceeding from it: PUCNANDO, MARĪD, DICTATORED, IN ALTOD MARĪD, NAVALED PREDAD on the Col. Rostr.; DE SENATVOS SENTENTIAD (thrice) IN OPPIDOD, IN POPLICOD, IN PREIVATOD, IN COVENTIONID, and the adverbs SVPRAD SCRIPTVM EST (thrice), EXSTRAD QVAM SEI, and even EXSTRAD VRBEM, in S. C. de Bacch. Here too belongs, no doubt, the adverb FACILVMED, found in the last-mentioned inscription. But this use of the d became obsolete at a very early date; so that, on the first epitaph of Scipio, PATRE already occurs along with GNAIVOD, and in the well-known fragments of the LEX. AGR. (A.U.C. 647; contained in Haubold Antiqu. Rom. Monum. Legalia, p. 10 sq.) there is no longer any trace of the ablative D. The origin of this d is difficult to account for; perhaps it is connected with the preposition de. Different from this is

B. The d which has arisen from the demonstrative de (in quamde, analogous to the c from ce, q. v.), and which was appended: 1. To the acc. sing. of personal pronouns ending in a vowel; as INTER SED CONIOVRASE and INTER SED DEDISSE VELET, in the S. C. de Bacch. By degrees this usage became restricted to the case in which the pronoun is followed by a word beginning in a vowel; so several times in Plautus med and ted. But in the classic period even this d no longer appears. On the other hand, it remained through all the stages of the language.—2. Appended to the neuter pronouns originally ending in a vowel, id (Gr. ῐ), quid, quod (Gr. τό ὅτι), istud, illud (from is-te, is-le), and alid, later aliud (Gr. ἄλλο). In the plural it is found only in the S. C. de Bacch.: ARVORSVM EAD.—3. In the older Latin attached to the particle SE = sine (Fest. p. 148; cf. Comm. p. 706), whence the conjunction sed and the compound seditio (v. the artt. sine, sed, and seditio). And perhaps in like manner may be explained the forms prod and red for pro and re in the compounds prodire, prodesse, prodigo; redarguo, redeo, redintegro, redhibeo, etc.; red-do; and with epenthetic I in redi-vivus; as also the ante-classic forms antidea, antideo, antidhac, for antea, anteeo, and antehac (v. h. vv.); but postidea for postea appears to have been formed simply after the analogy of antidea.

V. As an abbreviation, D. usually stands for the prænomen Decimus; also Deus, Divus, Dominus, Decurio, etc.; over epitaphs, D. M., Diis Manibus; over temple inscriptions, D. O. M., Deo Optimo Maxumo; in the titles of the later emperors, D. N., Dominus Noster, and D. D. N. N., Domini Nostri. Before dates of letters, D signified dabam, and also dies; hence, a. d., ante diem; in offerings to the gods, D. D., dono or donum dedit, D. D. D., dat, dicat, dedicat, etc. Cf. Orell. Inscr. II. p. 457 sq.

☞ The designation of the number 500 by D does not properly belong to this place; because this is not the letter D (which would have denoted the number 10; cf. D. for the name Decimus), but the half of the original Tuscan numeral Ⓘ or CIↃ for 1000, which is like the letter D in shape.
